

Megan McCluskey

9/7/26

MART 120.50

Rachel Cronk

I do think that learning styles affect how we learn. Being able to have your own learning experience allows you to retain information better. Personally, I am a visual learner. I need to watch someone complete the task that we are talking about, before being able to do it myself. I also find that block studying and taking breaks in between helps me retain information more. Being able to find your own personal style of learning is important, but also may not always help you with memorization. Overall, I think that learning styles affect how we learn a lot, but we don't always have to depend on those specific styles of learning.